No. 8957

THOMAS P. SPRUNT, Plaintiff & Appellant,

v.

THE DENVER & RIO GRANDE WESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY, a corporation, Defendant & Respondent.

WADE, Justice:

Thomas P. Sprunt, plaintiff and appellant herein, while performing his duties as a switchman for the Denver & Rio Grande Western Railroad Company, respondent herein, fell on some snow-covered rough ground in the yard of the Vitro Chemical Company in Salt Lake County and injured his shoulder. A jury awarded him a gross judgment of $15,000, but reduced the same two-thirds for his contributory negligence as allowed under the federal Employers' Liability Act, resulting in a net judgment of $5,000. He appeals, attacking the finding of contributory negligence and the inadequacy of the damages.

Appellant contends that there was no evidence introduced showing that he had not acted as a reasonably prudent person in the same circumstances would have acted and the jury should have been instructed he was not guilty of contributory negligence and therefore the court erred in submitting the question of contributory negligence to the jury.

If the evidence will reasonably support a finding of contributory negligence, then the court did not err in submitting that issue to the jury.[1]

[1] Rogalski v. Phillips Pet. Co., 3 Utah 2d 203, 282 P. 2d 304; Cooper v. Evans, 1 Utah 2d 68, 262 P. 2d 278 and Stickle v. U. P. RR. Co., 122 Utah 477, 251 P. 2d 867.

The evidence disclosed that at the time of the accident appellant was the foreman of respondent's switching crew working in the yards of the Vitro Chemical Company. The terrain adjacent to the tracks where the switching crews worked was rough and pockmarked with holes caused by a clam shell machine. This machine was used to pick up ore dumped from the cars by the side of the tracks and redeposited in stockpiles further removed from the tracks. Appellant had been employed by defendant as a switchman for over 25 years and had been acquainted for at least six months with the existing condition in the yard of the Vitro Chemical Company. On the day that appellant was injured the holes were covered with snow which had fallen during the night. Appellant was in the process of checking cars and as he was walking along taking their numbers the cars began to move, going about two or three miles per hour. In attempting to board one of the moving cars in his customary manner he got a hold with left hand but missed with his right hand because he had stepped into a hole and slipped causing him to lose his balance and fall.

Appellant argues that the evidence proves the accident was caused by the failure of the respondent to provide him with a safe place to work and the fact that he had knowledge of the hazardous conditions under which he was compelled to work would be important if the defense of assumption of risk were available to respondent. But the same fact should not be a basis for a finding of contributory negligence, and therefore there is no basis upon which it could reasonably be found that appellant was negligent.

The court properly instructed the jury that the Federal Employers' Liability Act made unavailable to the respondent the defense of assumption of risk by an employee who suffers an injury "because of any defect due to its negligence in its appliances, roadbed or equipment. . . ." Appellant's contention that his knowledge of a hazardous condition cannot be the basis for a finding of negligence is not sound. We must assume that the jury followed the instructions of the court, and that it did not find appellant negligent because he had assumed the risks of his employment. It would not be unreasonable to conclude that a reasonably prudent person, with knowledge of the fact that the snow covered holes where he was working, should take the precaution to ascertain whether he was standing on or near sufficiently firm ground to safely make the swing onto the moving cars and that the failure to do so was a proximate cause of the injury. The fact that if the defense of assumption of risk had been available to respondent, appellant's knowledge of the hazardous conditions would have been pertinent, does not make such knowledge unavailable as a basis for a finding of negligence if it could be reasonably found that a prudent person with such knowledge would not have attempted to board the cars without first ascertaining whether he was standing at or near sufficiently firm ground to proceed safely. The court therefore did not err in submitting the question of contributory negligence to the jury.

There is also no merit to appellant's contention that the damages awarded were so inadequate as to show that the jury had failed to follow the court's instructions because from the evidence introduced as to his life expectancy and the difference in the amounts he had been earning before and after the accident, the jury should have found his damages were almost double that which were actually awarded him. Although the evidence introduced could have justified a larger verdict than granted, the evidence of the actual damage suffered by appellant was not so certain that the amount granted is so inadequate as to make it appear that it was given under the influence of passion or prejudice or that in the interest of justice it should be set aside. The jury was not bound to believe that appellant would live a definite number of years even though the mortality table showed the average life expectancy of a person his age, nor were they bound to believe that appellant's earnings would have remained the same after the accident if he had not been incapacitated by his injuries, nor that his earning capacity was reduced as much as he claimed. The evidence submitted was merely a guide to aid in arriving at an award. Under such a state of facts we do not interfere with the judgment of the jury. Bodon v. Suhrmann, 327 P.2d 826, 8 Utah 2d 42, cited by appellant has not changed the reasons upon which this court will change an award of damages by a jury. The jury in this case awarded $15,000. This is a substantial amount and this court cannot say that justice demands a different result.

Affirmed. Costs to respondent.

STATUTES

45 USCA § 51. LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIERS BY RAILROAD; IN INTERSTATE OR FOREIGN COMMERCE, FOR INJURIES TO EMPLOYEES FROM NEGLIGENCE; DEFINITION OF EMPLOYEES

Every common carrier by railroad while engaging in commerce between any of the several States or Territories, or between any of the States and Territories, or between the District of Columbia and any of the States or Territories, or between the District of Columbia or any of the States or Territories and any foreign nation or nations, shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce, or, in case of the death of such employee, to his or her personal representative, for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee; and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee, for such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment.

Any employee of a carrier, any part of whose duties as such employee shall be the furtherance of interstate or foreign commerce; or shall, in any way directly or closely and substantially, affect such commerce as above set forth shall, for the purposes of this chapter, be considered as being employed by such carrier in such commerce and shall be considered as entitled to the benefits of this chapter. Apr. 22, 1908, c. 149, § 1, 35 Stat. 65; Aug. 11, 1939, c. 685, § 1, 53 Stat. 1404.

45 USCA § 53. CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE; DIMINUTION OF DAMAGES

In all actions hereafter brought against any such common carrier by railroad under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this chapter to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee, or where such injuries have resulted in his death, the fact that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee: Provided, That no such employee who may be injured or killed shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee. Apr. 22, 1908, c. 149, § 3, 35 Stat. 66.

45 USCA § 54. Assumption of Risks of Employment

In any action brought against any common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this chapter to recover damages for injuries to, or the death of, any of its employees, such employee shall not be held to have assumed the risks of his employment in any case where such injury or death resulted in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier; and no employee shall be held to have assumed the risks of his employment in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee. Apr. 22, 1908, c. 149, § 4, 35 Stat. 66; Aug. 11, 1939, c. 685, § 1, 53 Stat. 1404.

BRIEF OF RESPONDENT OPPOSING PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Petitioner's statement of the case in his brief is too skeletal to give the court an adequate picture of the facts. This statement is made to outline the essential evidence more fully.

During the daylight hours of January 4, 1957, the plaintiff, a 58 year old switchman, employed by the defendant company, was injured when he attempted to board an ore car which had just started to move and which was travelling two or three miles per hour. (R. 41). The plaintiff was part of a switch crew which was moving cars loaded with uranium ore into private yards and moving the empties out (R. 13, R. 24). The process involved bringing in a string of loaded cars, which were unloaded by means of opening dump doors on the sides of the cars, allowing the ore to fall out beside the track (R. 17). The ore was then picked up by a clam shell machine (a diesel machine with a two yard bucket) (R. 18), and deposited in stock piles farther away from the track. Then a bulldozer would proceed along the area to attempt to remove ore that had fallen between the rails and to clean and smooth up the area adjacent to the tracks (R. 28).

Two or three cuts or groups of cars were delivered each day (R. 26) so that 12 to 18 cars a day were unloaded (R. 25, 56). The switching and unloading was a continuous process throughout the day (R. 137). According to the plaintiff the operation of the clam-shell in picking up the ore took bites out of the ground in the area adjacent to the track, which created the existence of numerous holes 8 to 12 inches deep (R. 43). The witness Patterson, another member of the crew, claimed that the bulldozer did not necessarily remove all the holes in the process of its smoothing operation. (R. 19). This operation, according to plaintiff and his witness, created a rough area over which the plaintiff and other switchmen had to walk. Patterson testified that the holes were "Maybe three feet, maybe five feet" apart (R. 23).

Plaintiff testified as follows on page 53:

"Q. Even though the track was cleaned up and it was cleaned up as slick as a bowling alley, when another string of cars would come it would clutter up the situation?

"A. Yes.

"Q. In other words, if you clean up as I say, clean as a bowling alley, you would have to do it two or three times a day?

"A. Yes."

At the time of the accident there was a "light skiff of snow" on the ground (R. 31). The plaintiff attempted to board one of the moving cars by taking hold of a grab iron on the side of the car with his left hand, putting his foot in a stirrup and swinging himself up onto the car. He claimed his foot slipped or he stepped into a hole, fell and injured his left shoulder (R. 41-42).

Exactly what happened or what he did at the time of the accident is not clear in the plaintiff's mind for he describes it differently in different places in the record.

"Q. (By Mr. Patterson) Now, what happened when you--describe how you started to mount the car, what you did?

"A. Well, as a general rule when you are switching on a lead, or anything, we most generally hit the stirrup with our right foot and most generally reach up with the one hand, get hold of the grab iron and follow up with the other, when I went to follow up I slipped in the meantime, and I couldn't get the grab iron.

"Q. Why did you slip?

"A. I stepped in a hole.

"Q. Will you describe that hole to the jury, please?

"A. Well, as far as I remember, it was a hole along side the cars where we walked, made by the clam shovel cleaning up the ore.

"Q. Describe the hole itself as much as you can?

"A. I would say the hole was around between eight and twelve inches deep." (R. 42-43)

Later on cross examination the plaintiff said:

"Q. Mr. Sprunt, as I understand you reached up with your left hand to board the car going about two or three miles an hour, is that right?

"A. Yes sir.

"Q. When you got your hand on that particular bar, how high would that be?

"A. I would say about even with my face.

"Q. In these dump cars they are kind of low?

"A. Well, yes, your ladder on cars is a standard gauge.

"Q. The grab iron you were going to reach from the ground would be about that high?

"A. Yes.

"Q. You reached with your left hand?

"A. Yes sir.

"Q. When you reached with your left hand, did you put any weight on there for the purpose of boarding the car?

"A. Well, no, not exactly.

"Q. Mr. Sprunt, I am not trying to get you in detailing the matter to relate what each muscle did in this particular time. When you reached up, what was the usual way to do it, put the weight on one hand?

"A. Most generally put the weight on both hands.

"Q. You reached with the left hand, and hadn't got your weight up?

"A. No sir.

"Q. You were walking when this occurred?

"A. No.

"Q. You were standing still?

"A. Yes.

"Q. So you were standing still when the car came past going about two or three miles an hour and you reached up with your left hand?

"A. Yes sir, that is right.

"Q. Were you standing in a hole?

"A. No I wasn't.

"Q. Did you move your feet before you got aboard?

"A. That is something I can't say.

"Q. As you reached with your left hand, as you started to board, your foot went in a hole?

"A. No, generally when you are boarding a car you swing yourself on, when I went to swing on I slipped." (R. 58-59)

The plaintiff's left hand lost its grip on the grab iron and he fell to the ground (R. 60).

On page 43 of the record, the plaintiff says:
". . , it was done so quick I don't know how I fell."

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The questions presented by the plaintiff's counsel in his brief are simply not pertinent to the cause at all. The only question is: Was the trial court justified in submitting the issue of plaintiff's contributory negligence to the jury? Assumption of risk has nothing to do with this case. It is admitted by plaintiff's counsel that the jury was specifically and clearly instructed that assumption of risk was not a defense. The issue of contributory negligence was submitted under proper instructions. Injecting the issue of assumption of risk into this case is simply setting up a straw man and then trying to knock it down.

Defendant contends that the evidence required the court to submit the issue of plaintiff's contributory negligence to the jury; that it was properly submitted and the jury decided that the plaintiff was contributorily negligent and rendered its verdict with appropriate diminution thereof for the plaintiff's contributory negligence.

Inasmuch as the jury was properly allowed to perform its historic function, and it would have been an error to deny the jury that right, the Writ of Certiorari should be denied.

ARGUMENT

Defendant denies that its case is in any way founded or dependent upon the doctrine of assumption of risk. Defendant agrees with plaintiff that every vestige of the doctrine of assumption of risk was obliterated from the law by the 1939 amendment to the Federal Employers Liability Act (Tiller vs. Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, 318 U. S. 54, 87 L. ed 610). As admitted by plaintiff in his brief to the Utah Supreme Court, (P. 23), the Court "instructed the jury that assumption of risk was not a defense and that the burden of proving contributory negligence was on the defendant."

Defendant relies, as will be demonstrated hereinafter, on specific acts of negligence on the part of plaintiff to sustain its position that the plaintiff was contributorily negligent and that the court properly submitted that issue to the jury.

Following are the acts of the plaintiff, appearing in the record, which reasonable jurors could conclude would be negligent:

1. Jurors might reasonably have believed that the plaintiff could and in the exercise of reasonable care should have selected a safer place to board the car because:

(a) Plaintiff knew there were gouge marks left by the clam shell which could constitute a hazard unless he watched his footing carefully;

(b) There is evidence there was only a "light skiff of snow" on the ground (R. 31);

(c) Plaintiff claimed the gouge mark involved was eight to twelve inches deep (R. 43);

(d) The gouge marks were three to five feet apart (R. 23).

Members of the jury could reasonably have concluded that a hole eight to twelve inches deep could and should have been seen by the plaintiff if there was only a light skiff of snow on it; and inasmuch as there were areas three to five feet wide without holes or gouge marks, he had ample opportunity to stand in areas of safety to board the car and did not have to stand on the edge of a hole.

2. The plaintiff admitted in his testimony that it was customary to take hold of a grab iron with both hands and distribute the task of pulling oneself up onto the car between both hands. On page 58 of the Record, plaintiff was asked by counsel, "When you reached up, what was the usual way to do it, put the weight on one hand?" and the plaintiff answered, "Most generally put the weight on both hands." Members of the jury may reasonably have concluded that the plaintiff was negligent in this instance in grabbing with one hand and imposing all of the initial strain on that one arm, his left, rather than using both arms, especially when the plaintiff was conscious of the fact that his left shoulder was weak from previous dislocations. (R. 60, 75, 77)

3. The members of the jury may reasonably have believed that the plaintiff carelessly got a foot in the stirrup before he took a firm grip—or any grip at all with his hand—and as a result lost his balance and slipped and fell.

4. The jury may reasonably have concluded it was negligent for plaintiff to attempt to board the car from an area of rough footing when he could have walked alongside the car and performed his duties. Mr. Sprunt claimed that he had to board the car so that he could give signals to the engineer. However, the jury may not have believed that in light of the fact that Mr. Patterson, the other switchman, testified that he, Patterson, was riding the head end car of the seven or eight car cut (R. 20), that is, the car farthest from the engine (the cars were being backed toward the hopper) and he, Patterson, gave the signal to the engineer to make the backward movement and to stop the movement when he saw the plaintiff lying on the ground. Therefore, according to Patterson's testimony he, Patterson, was where the engineer could see him and he being on the lead car would be the man to give the signal when to stop the cut in the vicinity of the hopper. In other words, in spite of the plaintiff's statement, it does not appear from the Record that the plaintiff would have been the man to give the signal, for he would have been riding on the east side of a car about halfway between the end of the cut and the engine. He would have been in no position to know when the stop signal should be given to the engineer to stop the cut when the cars were properly lined up for the hopper (R. 20).

5. The plaintiff states in one place in the record that he was standing still when he attempted to board the car. In another place he says he stepped in a hole. With this conflict in his account of the incident, members of the jury could reasonably have concluded that he was walking immediately before he attempted to board or that at least he took one step before or as he attempted to board and that he simply didn't observe with due care where he was stepping and that the careless step resulted in the slip and fall.

6. Members of the jury might have reasonably concluded that the alleged hole had nothing to do with the fall; that the plaintiff didn't slip or step into a hole, because on page 59 of the record, plaintiff testified as follows:

> "Q. As you reached with your left hand, as you started to board, your foot went in a hole?
> "A. No, generally when you are boarding a car you swing yourself on, when I went to swing on I slipped."

Earlier on page 43 of the record, the plaintiff said: ". . . it was done so quick I don't know how I fell."

Consequently members of the jury could reasonably have concluded that the cause of this accident was that the plaintiff did not step with due care on the slippery snow on the ground and because of his lack of care simply slipped on the snow and the hole had nothing to do with it.

The six items above are all examples of conduct on the part of the plaintiff documented in the record which the jury could reasonably consider negligence. None of them have anything to do with assumption of risk. None of them are dependent on or related to the assumption of risk doctrine.

In light of the above decisions that might have been made by reasonable men acting on a jury, let us take a look at the law applicable.

In the FELA case of Wilkerson vs. McCarthy, 336 U.S. 53, 93 L. ed. 497, a case arising out of Utah, Justice Douglas in his concurring opinion, reviewed all of the FELA cases decided by the court for the preceding ten years and made this statement:

> "The criterion covering the exercise of our discretion in granting or denying certiorari is not who loses below but whether the jury function in passing on disputed questions of fact and in drawing inferences from proven facts has been respected."

In this case the jury function in passing on the disputed question of fact, that is, whether or not the plaintiff was contributorily negligent, was respected and, therefore, certiorari should be denied.

In the case of Everett vs. Southern Pacific Company, 181 Fed. 2d 58, 9th Circuit 1950, an FELA case, one of the issues involved was the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. On page 61 the Court said:

> "A jury's verdict is entitled to the same respect regardless of whether it be returned for plaintiff or for defendant, whether for employee or employer."

In Henwood vs. Coburn, 165 Fed. 2d 418, CCA 8th Circuit 1948, the Court said:

> "As we have pointed out, under the teaching of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court, the domain of the jury in circumstantial cases under the Federal Employers Liability Act may not be nar> rowly bounded, and the settling of any question of negligence or proximate cause, where more than one rational possibility is involved on the evidentiary facts, is exclusively within its field. This is true for every purpose in the case, and, in according the jury its inherent function, recognition of the right in one aspect or incident of a case is as important as in another."

In a case on which plaintiff relies heavily in his brief, that of Tiller vs. Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, 318 U. S. 54 (1943) the court clearly supports defendant's contention in this case that the issue of contributory negligence should be submitted to the jury whenever there are any disputed questions of fact. Inasmuch as The Tiller case is so important, a statement of the facts would not be inappropriate. In the court's words, the facts were as follows:

> "... Tiller (the plaintiff) was standing between two tracks in the respondent's switch yards, tracks which allowed him three feet, seven and one-half inches of standing space when trains were moving on both sides. The night was dark and the yard was unlighted. Tiller, using a flashlight for the purpose, was inspecting the seals of the train moving slowly on one track when suddenly he was hit and killed by the rear car of a train backing in the opposite direction on the other track. The rear of the train which killed Tiller was unlighted although a brakeman with a lantern was riding on the back step on the side away from Tiller. The bell was ringing on the engine but both trains were moving. The Circuit Court found that it was 'probable that Tiller did not hear cars approaching' from behind him. No special signal of warning was given."

After eloquently disposing of the defense of assumption of risk, the court (Justice Black) said:

> "No case is to be withheld from a jury on any theory of assumption of risk and questions of negligence should under proper charge from the court be submitted to the jury for their determination. Many years ago this court said of the problems of negligence 'we see no reason, so long as the jury system is the law of the land, and the jury is made the tribunal to decide disputed questions of fact, why it shouldn't decide such questions as these as well as others.' Jones vs. Tennessee, V. & GR Company, 128 U. S. 443, 445, 32 Lawyers Edition 478, 479. Or as we have put it on another occasion, 'where the facts are in dispute, and the evidence in relation to them is that from which fair-minded men may draw different inferences,' the case should go to the jury.
> "We think that the question of negligence on the part of the railroad and on the part of the employee should have been submitted to the jury."

Referring again to the case of Wilkerson vs. McCarthy Supra, the Court restated the principle on which the defendant relies in these words:

> "This court has previously held in many cases that where jury trials are required, courts must submit the issues of negligence to a jury, if evidence might justify a finding either way on those issues."

Then the Court cites several of its own opinions to support this principle:

Lavender vs. Kurn, 327 U. S. 645, 90 L. ed 916, 66 S. Ct. 740.

Bailey vs. Central Vermont Railway Company, 319 U. S. 350, 87 L. ed 1444, 63 S. Ct. 1062.

Tiller vs. Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, supra.

Brady vs. Southern Railway Company, 320 U. S. 476, 88 L. ed 239, 64 S. Ct. 232.

If plaintiffs in FELA cases could successfully claim that most acts of carelessness on their part proximately contributing to their injury, did not constitute negligence but were part of a broad package of assumption of risk, then the comparative negligence principle of the Federal Employers Liability Act would be substantially destroyed and the employer would become an insurer. This fact is recognized in a case cited in the plaintiff's brief, Murray vs. New York, New Haven and Hartford Railway Company, 253 Fed. 2d 42, U.S.C.A. 2d, decided in 1958. While the plaintiff's counsel in his brief referred frequently to that case, he avoided quoting this significant principle enunciated by Judge Waterman on page 44 of his opinion.

> "The defendant may not be denied its partial defense of contributory negligence merely because the same evidence would be pertinent to prove assumption of risk."

In upholding the jury verdict in this case, the Utah Supreme Court relied on several of its previous decisions which are consistent with the rule that has been laid down by this Honorable Court, as demonstrated above. In the case of Bennett vs. Denver and Rio Grande Western Railroad Company, 117 Utah 57, 213 Pac. 2d 325, a FELA case, a jury awarded the plaintiff brakeman damages in the amount of $70,000.00 and thereafter diminished the amount by $20,000.00 upon finding the plaintiff's negligence contributed to his own injury. The defendant appealed and the plaintiff cross-appealed. The basis of plaintiff's cross-appeal, as in the case at bar, was that the issue of contributory negligence should not have been submitted to the jury. It was his contention that the court should have found that he was not negligent as a matter of law.

The Utah Court quoted from Lavender vs. Kurn supra as follows:

> ". . . Only when there is a complete absence of probative facts to support the conclusion reached does a reversible error appear, but where, as here, there is an evidentiary basis for the jury's verdict, the jury is free to discard or disbelieve whatever facts are inconsistent with its conclusions. And the Appelate Court's function is exhausted when that evidentiary basis becomes apparent, it being immaterial that the court might draw a contrary inference or feel that another conclusion is more reasonable."

The Utah Court referred to the above quotation, then said:

> "The same rule should be applied against the employee and if from the evidence in this case the jury could fairly infer that the respondent did not use due care in his movements on top of the car, then we are not at liberty to set aside its findings."

In the case of Rogalski vs. Phillips Petroleum Company, 282 P. 2d 304 (1955 Utah) which was a master and servant case, the Court said:

> "It has been frequently announced by this court that contributory negligence is a question for the jury unless all reasonable men must draw the same conclusion from the facts as they are shown. Shafer v. Keeley Ice Cream Co., 65 Utah 46, 234 P. 300, 38 A.L.R. 1523; Lowe v. Salt Lake City, 13 Utah 91, 44 P. 1050, 57 Am. St. Rep. 708, Baker v. Decker, 117 Utah 15, 212 P. 2d 679. As was said in Linden v. Anchor Min. Co., 20 Utah 134, 58 P. 355, 358:
> "Where there is uncertainty as to the existence of either negligence or contributory negligence, the question is not one of law, but of fact, and to be settled by a jury; and this, whether the uncertainty > arises from a conflict in the testimony, or because, the facts being undisputed, fair-minded men will honestly draw different conclusions from them."

In the Utah case of Cooper vs. Evans, 262 P. 2d 278 (Utah 1953), the principle of law is put in sharp focus by the fact that in that case the plaintiff claimed, as in this one, that the Court should have found her free of contributory negligence as a matter of law. This case is particularly helpful because some of the facts are strikingly analagous to facts involved in the case at bar.

The plaintiff received injuries in a fall over a portion of a merchandise platform owned by the defendants which jutted out into a walk-way in the defendant's store. The trial court entered judgment for the defendants and the plaintiff appealed. In the trial court the jury had submitted an interrogatory for the jury to answer, asking whether plaintiff's failure to observe and see the platform amounted to contributory negligence. The jury answered the question in the affirmative and based on the jury's finding of contributory negligence, the court entered judgment for the defendants.

The court, in the case at bar, might very well have submitted a similar interrogatory to the jury, asking whether or not they believed plaintiff's failure to observe and see the hole in which he claimed he stepped, constituted contributory negligence.

In the Cooper case, the court said:

> "It is to be noted that although the word 'observe' as used in the interrogatory could be given a meaning equivalent to 'make observation for,' the more usual understanding is to regard the words 'observe' and 'see' as synonymous. Under such meaning, in telling the jury that Mrs. Cooper failed to 'observe and see,' the court was only stating to them that uncontroverted fact, for Mrs. Cooper concedes that she did not see the obstruction. The court was aware that under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, the conduct of Mrs. Cooper in failing to see the platform might, or might not, meet the standard of care required of her, and that the application of such standard is peculiarly within the province of the jury.

"Plaintiff is in error in her contention that the question of the existence of contributory negligence, under the situation which we here consider, is one of law. Contributory negligence would only be a question of law where the evidence showed, with such certainty that reasonable minds could not differ thereon, that the conduct in question either met or failed to meet the standard of due care. But where there is uncertainty as to whether such standard has been met so that reasonable minds could differ upon it, the question of whether such negligence exists is not a matter of law, but is one for the jury to determine."

CONCLUSION

Defendant is willing to stand on the language of the Utah court in its opinion in this case, 340 Pac. 2d 85:

"The court properly instructed the jury that the Federal Employers' Liability Act made unavailable to the respondent the defense of assumption of risk by an employee who suffers an injury 'because of any defect due to its negligence in its appliances, roadbed or equipment . . .' Appellant's contention that his knowledge of a hazardous condition cannot be the basis for a finding of negligence is not sound. We must assume that the jury followed the instructions of the court, and that it did not find appellant negligent because he had assumed the risks of his employment. It would not be unreasonable to conclude that a reasonably prudent person, with knowledge of the fact that the snow covered holes where he was working should take the precaution to ascertain whether he was standing on or near sufficiently firm ground to safely make the swing onto the moving cars and that the failure to do so was a proximate cause of the injury. The fact that if the defense of assumption of risk had been available to respondent, appellant's knowledge of the hazardous condition would have been pertinent, does not make such knowledge unavailable as a basis for a finding of negligence if it could be reasonably found that a prudent person with such knowledge would not have attempted to board the cars without first ascertaining whether he was standing at or near sufficiently firm ground to proceed safely. The court therefore did not err in submitting the question of contributory negligence to the jury."

Defendant respectfully submits that the Petition for the writ should be denied.
